In comparing the education of Athens with that of Sparta, we are at once struck with two great distinctions: (1) While Spartan education is public, Athenian education is mainly private; (2) While Sparta educates for war, Athens educates for peace. As to the former of these, it is not a little remarkable that, while many of the first thinkers of Greece, including Plato and Aristotle, advocated an entirely public education, Athens never adopted it, or even took any steps in that direction.

In ancient India, education was imparted and passed on orally rather than in written form. Education was a process that involved three steps, first was 'Sravana' which is the acquisition of knowledge by listening to the Shrutis. The second is 'Manana' wherein the students think, analyze and make inferences.
